New Developments: Integration of Managed Care and LTSS for Dual Eligibles

Alameda County is not one of the four “Dual Integration Demonstration” counties announced by DHCS on Wednesday. What does this mean? That depends on legislative action in June.

The proposal that Department of Health Care Services released on April 4 – and will submit to Center for Medicare & Medicaid Services for approval following a 30-day comment period – seeks to launch the Dual Demonstration in ten counties in 2013. That’s the four counties that current legislation permits (DHCS chose Los Angeles, San Diego, Orange and San Mateo), plus six other counties that applied for Demonstration Status (Alameda, Santa Clara, Riverside, San Bernardino, and Sacramento).

The ten-county demonstration is included in the Governor’s proposed budget trailer bill as part of his Coordinated Care Initiative, a plan to extend managed care to all California Counties by 2015. The proposed phase-in anticipates the launch of the Dual Demonstration in the first ten counties as early as January 2013, dependent on California’s legislature passing the budget trailer bill and CMS approving the state’s plan.

While we can’t be sure what the legislature or CMS will do in the short term, the writing is on the wall. In the next few years, the integration of managed care and long term services and supports for Alameda County’s 47,000 dual eligibles will fundamentally change the way low-income seniors and people with disabilities receive medical and supportive services in the community. Because this change will impact community-based organizations that provide so many services to seniors who are not eligible for Medi-Cal, this will really change the system for everyone. By engaging in the process and working together, providers and consumers can define the new system (stay tuned for more on this process).
